that $75,000,000 of this must be furnished by institutions which make a specialty of building loans.

Building the loan associations of the state have been hard pressed for some time to secure the funds to meet requests for loans on improved property, and the increase in home building within a few months and that in prospect creates a demand for money that cannot be met by the associations.

There is only one way in which the building program can be made effective, and that is for persons with money to divert part of it into the channels which supply funds for building. The work done by building and loan associations for years commends them to consideration as an agency for promoting the general public welfare in building.

"Home building is a key industry," a bulletin of the Ohio Building Association says, "because it utilizes practically all our activities and resources. It reaches into the mine, the forest and into a multitude of factories, and gives to agriculture and various lines of business the support that is imperative to prosperous conditions."
